Applying for the Educator's Professional Master's Program Scholarship

With this essay, I would like to apply for the Educator's Professional Master's Program Scholarship. Having already acquired a preliminary B.A. in Education, I now aim to continue my studies and successfully achieve my career goal—becoming a university adviser and student counselor.

The choice to work in education was not random. Having joined the masses of college entrants four years ago, unlike most of my future colleagues at the University of Maine, I already knew what I wanted to study and who I wanted to become as a result. When I think of what influenced my choice of a future profession, I picture a particular person: my high school guidance counselor. This person transformed my life, with no exaggeration. When I was a high school freshman, my life seemed like a meaningless mess of obstacles. I realize that most teenagers probably face the same troubles at this particular stage in life. But my situation was made worse by the bitter event that completely shook my world—the death of my father. It was a terrible shock for the whole family. My mother seemed to have entered an endless phase of depression; my older sister left the family house to live with her boyfriend in another state; and I felt completely alone, abandoned, and helpless. Of course, my high school friends felt sorry and tried to support me at first. But as the weeks passed by, I remained numb to the world around me, so they are not to blame for having eventually given up on me as well.

4.1. Product Marketing

The Store sells mass marketed sporting goods and fitness apparel that is trendy, in demand, and competitively priced. Merchandising, cross-selling and up-selling will be used to encourage customers to complete purchases and even increase their orders.

Merchandising

Both the store and web site use the same merchandising presentation. Sporting goods and fitness apparel are grouped by activity, such as golfing, exercise equipment or team sports to show how they work together. Photographs of people enjoying each activity are positioned alongside the merchandise. Salespeople are trained to promote the products by their attributes as well as by brand and price. Expert merchandising increases conversion rates and order amount.

Cross-Selling

A natural extension of this merchandising approach is cross-selling. Products are grouped together so that related items are visible while the shopper is browsing. Suggestions of what products to buy together can come from a salesperson or display materials, either hard copy in the store or digital online. This personalizes the buying experience, with the customer learning more about product usage and feeling that all his needs have been anticipated and met. Not only does cross-selling add additional items to the shopping cart and increase total order, it also enhances customer satisfaction.

Up-Selling

Up-selling is the offer of a product that is an upgrade to what the customer is considering buying. Competing products that vary in price and features are arranged together for easy comparison. Charts in the store or online illustrate features and prices of the range of products. Display materials that quote professionals on improved performance and satisfaction with upgraded products help the customer make a buying decision. Online, up-sells are placed on the initial product display page, and later during the checkout process for last minute impulse shoppers. Salespeople that personalize up-selling further enhance customer service and increase total order amount.

4.2. Pricing

One component of The Store's brand image is low price. Although The Store may not always be the lowest cost option in the market, it is always competitively priced and seeks to give its customers good value for their dollar. This is especially important at the online store. Internet customers comparison-shop before purchase to locate the lowest total cost--product price plus shipping and tax. Sucharita Mulpuru, Forrester Research principal analyst, sums it up by saying, "The casual shopper goes online to look for the best price, leveraging the transparency of the Internet to save money."

The online store can offer low prices because of high sales volume and gross margins in this channel. The addition of the online store has also improved pricing at the physical store, which has been able to lower its prices as a result of growing Internet sales. Physical store prices are now only slightly higher than the lowest-priced, brick-and-mortar store competition. The Store as a company has been able to strengthen its brand image as a low price option in both channels because of this spillover effect from the online store to the physical store.

Executive Summary

Questions this section should briefly answer:

- What is the name and overall concept of the restaurant?
- What are its projected sales and income?
- Who is the target customer?
- Where will the restaurant be located?
- Who is developing this restaurant?
- How much will the restaurant cost to build?
- How much money is needed? How much will be raised from investors and how much from lenders?
- How much of their own money will the development team contribute to the project?
- What is the potential return on investment and payback period?

People reading this section will be most interested in:

- Being able to quickly get a clear understanding of the key points raised by your business plan
- The key financials: projected sales, income, capital budget, and investment structure

Handy hints:

- Many investors make the decision whether to consider a project based solely on the executive summary – they do not have the time to read the full document unless they think the project is viable and well considered. Therefore a prospective investor or lender should be able to get enough information from the executive summary to understand what your restaurant is and how it is projected to perform without reading any further.
- This summary should be ideally only one page on length, and never more than two pages.
- Avoid using too many subjective adjectives – focus on making clear and factual statements rather than trying to impress or persuade with "hype" that cannot be supported.
- Everything mentioned in the executive summary should be discussed in more detail within the business plan.

Dear Mr. Board:

I am requesting a business loan in the amount of $25,000.00 for the purpose of expanding my warehouse facilities. The loan will be repaid in monthly installments of $500.00 over a period of 5 years. The increase in business necessitates I expand my current warehouse facilities to accommodate a larger inventory.

I have significant experience in the home decorating business and I am considered an expert consultant in this field. I have been employed by Lindon's Home Decorating Services since graduating from Decorating Degree. Home Entertainments and Jasmine's Town and Country Designs. I started Lindon's Home Decorating Services in 1999 and the company has earned a profit consistently year after year, even during the recession.

The market for this business is heavily dependent on the housing market and the health of the economy. Fortunately, my business has been very successful in the Las Vegas area and the recession has not negatively affected my business during the recent recession. Today, the housing market is improving rapidly and the economy is showing significant signs of recovery. In addition, slowly increases in the building supply market suggest a growing trend in home remodeling.

My customer list includes five large hotel chains and two large national corporations that provide my business with a steady stream of income. I also have an extensive marketing strategies that result in an average of 200 new orders every month from private homeowners.

To date, I have invested and recouped through profits $200,000.00 of my own money. I intend to invest $50,000.00 of my own money in the business. I have enclosed a statement of my business assets and a true market value of $500,000.00 and personal assets valued at $500,000.00.

Enclosed is my business plan which details the reasons of the loan request. You may contact me at 666-832-9945 if you have any questions.

Sincerely,
Ina Lindon
